

Documenting and Preserving Indigenous Traditions

Our university is dedicated to documenting and preserving Indigenous culture and traditions. To gain a deeper understanding of Indigenous lifestyles and cultural traditions, we organize visits to Indigenous communities to learn about their unique customs, craftsmanship, and traditional rituals. Through these field trips, these valuable cultural heritage elements are directly observed and learned. Interacting with community members or elders provides us with a more authentic cultural experience.

Providence University invites experts, scholars, and Indigenous representatives to deliver various lectures on Indigenous knowledge, culture, music, and dance. These lectures enable us to gain deeper insights into Indigenous history, folklore, and contemporary challenges. They not only enhance public awareness of Indigenous culture but also foster cross-cultural dialogue and understanding.

Art exhibitions are another crucial way to showcase Indigenous culture. By displaying traditional crafts, paintings, and sculptures, we can directly experience their cultural features and creativity. These exhibitions not only attract more attention to Indigenous art but also help preserve and transmit skills that may otherwise fade due to modernization.
